

AI Control

Contradictions

AI Response:

"Akima as "best fit" leaves a stated tension unresolved. You flag that Akima's team culture skews toward traditional RPGs and that you're "not going for traditional" — then still call it your best option because it's entry-level. Those two things aren't reconciled anywhere in the document. What would test this: whether "traditional RPG fans on the team" actually shapes the work you'd do (Akima builds serious/training games, not RPGs), or whether it's a real day-to-day friction. Right now that's a gap in your own reasoning, not a contradiction in the source material — but it's the kind of thing that could change your ranking if you dug into it."

My response:

I did not know what game Akima was playing. I was just scrolling through listings for “Game Development Entry Level” And found this between Tabletop RPGs and Hasbro. I read the job description and no where in the listing did I find evidence of Akima making nothing but Flight Simulators and driving sims. Against all thoughts that tell me to just ignore this and move on, I accept this harrowing truth and leave myself with only 2 options left: Spellbrush and Epic. At least

Trajectory Forward

AI Response:

“Trajectory A: Entry-level studio path (Akima-style)

Assumption: Working alongside others who don't share your creative interests (traditional RPG fans, on a serious-games/training project rather than your own worldbuilding) is workable friction, not a dealbreaker.

Evidence you already have: Akima's listing, your own ranking of it as "best fit" for being entry-level, and your SWOT noting group communication as a weakness you're aware of but haven't resolved ("doesn't communicate often unless it's in the moment").

Evidence you'd need: Something closer to firsthand insight into what day-to-day collaboration on a serious-games/training project actually looks like — since right now your only data point is the job posting text, not the work itself. You flagged this tension yourself in 1C without resolving it.

Small step now: Since Unity is common to all three listings, and your self-rating already shows Unity as a bigger gap than "amateur," time spent specifically in Unity (not RPG Maker) is useful whether you end up at Akima, Spellbrush, or anywhere else that lists it.

Trajectory B: Small/indie-adjacent path (Spellbrush-style)

Assumption: You'd rather build within a small group where the "cooperation" surface area is narrower, even if it means tolerating a requirement you flagged as unfamiliar — working alongside an AI agent as part of the team.

Evidence you already have: Spellbrush's listing (5+ years experience, high Unity/C# familiarity, one shipped Unity project) and your own reflection naming yourself as "amateur coder" — which is a real distance from what that listing asks for, more so than Akima's.

Evidence you'd need: this is the assumption that most needs testing — you haven't clarified in either document what "working with an AI agent" actually means for the role, only that it's a requirement you'd need to get comfortable with. Without knowing what that collaboration looks like day-to-day, it's hard to know if this path fits the kind of cooperation you're actually good at (per your SWOT: better one-on-one or "in the moment" than in ongoing group dynamics).

Small step now: Given the coding gap is larger here than in Trajectory A, deliberate coding practice — the kind you already mentioned doing in 1B ("practicing my coding skills") — is the one action that moves you closer to Spellbrush's bar specifically, without being wasted if you end up elsewhere, since every listing you picked lists C# or Unity scripting somewhere."

Revisions

Seeing now, the error of my initial research, my reluctantly-chosen AI-Agent: Claude, noticed many errors in my tasteful yet reasonable judgement. While I was swarmed in the assignments of other classes, Claude has dug deeper into 2 of my 3 research sites, and found beyond the notes I've made for them, the terrible truth: Akima is Realist, dad games, VTOL VR and all that. While Spellbrush wants me working EXTENSIVELY with an AI, on turn-based tactics, not active co-op with an objective. Neither of my first two listings really work well with my drift, that is, working on active combatants, with people who enjoy that type of thing. Co-Op, Friendslop, Horde-Shooting. I've yet to find better listings for me, and me bringing up other companies like Evil Raptor, makers of Far Far West, or even Gunfire Games, makers of Remnant II. They all read "No open req, but door left ajar." Remember my statement on Akima? Turns out Akima definitely DID NOT have my best interests at heart. Realistic games meant exclusively training simulators, NOT RPGs as said on their Indeed Job Description. Now I have one other possible place of vacancy left: BIGMODE, a Publisher with several games under their belt: Lethal Company, Star of Providence, Animal Well, all have given me hope yet. Not much have I studied on this particular subject since, all the others are currently "closed". I can only hope that this one is just as much into turbo-slaughter w/ friends as I am.